The Chess Champion is a Woman

I

Chess has been a game traditionally dominated by men, but that is changing. Several top women players have been very successful in recent years, including Judit Polgar. Born in Hungary in 1976, Judit comes from a chess-playing family. Her father, Laszlo, studied the lives of great intellectuals, and he decided that chess was an excellent discipline for the mind.

II

Judit and her two sisters began studying chess at the age of four. Laszlo quit his job and stayed home to teach his daughters. The girls played chess most of the day, in addition to learning some school subjects. They went outside once a day to play football or to run around in the garden. This unusual programme of study was controversial. Once, armed government officials came to the door of the Polgar home, thinking that Laszlo's daughters were in a potentially harmful situation.

III

Despite the critics, Laszlo's plan was successful. By the age of five, Judit could already beat her father at chess, and at nine, she won an important competition in New York. When she was fifteen, she became the youngest Grandmaster ever, beating even the record of the legendary Bobby Fischer. In 1998, she was the first woman in history to win the US Open.

IV

Judit has an aggressive style and a competitive personality. She also refuses to compete in any event that is strictly for women. Consequently, she is the only woman who has competed consistently against the top 20 players in the world. Some believe that one day, she will be the number one player in the world. In the meantime, she has broken down gender stereotypes and has made it possible for other female chess players who are interested in competing fairly against their male counterparts.
